Compare how Death of a Naturalist and The Prelude present nature.

Both poems show that the change in season also show the change in their childhood.

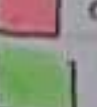

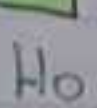

However both poets journeys are different. Heaney's childhood showed us the relationship between a human and a frog where Wordsworth showed us a child growing up in the hills of nature. Their childhood both showed us that nature will effect all of us at one time in our life, it maybe childhood or when we are grown up but ~~it~~ either way it effected these poets.

Wordsworth reflects on his past and sees how nature affected him. ~~However~~ Heaney did reflect on his past and his connection with animals. As Summer ~~too~~ slowly turned to winter, Heaney and Wordsworth grew up ~~and~~ to see that nature had effected him. Wordsworth's childhood had ended when 'The orange sky of 'evening died away' and Heaney's childhood ended when he finally realised on 'One hot day' his innocence had left his body. In the Prelude the 'Orange Sky' represents a sunset washing over the fields like Wordsworth's childhood washing away. In Death of a Naturalist, when Heaney grew up in Stanza 2 he realised that the fields he once loved were now 'crank'!! He realised this because ^{fascinated} as a child he was always fascinated by frogs. I believe his fascination of frogs started in school because his teacher would always say how 'the daddy frog was called a bull frog'.

Overall, these poems impacted me by the nostalgic love of childhood and their found memories. Heaney and Wordsworth's maybe different but they both show the impact it once shared. The poets message is that how much they grow in their lives they will always remember their innocent childhood.
